next, let's consider the different types of assessment tools and their

psychometric characteristics, you may want to photocopy this page and look over it during the intake interview as you think about what sort of testing your client will undergo. it may help you to think of assessments as tests with varying properties. make sure to not make any assumptions about mental health among the clients you will be interviewing, it could be helpful to know information about whether or not the client has a history of professional care for his or her mental health. has he or she seen a psychiatrist, a clinical social worker, or a psychologist? has the client been on psychiatric medications? if so, how long was he or she on the medications? has a loved one or other significant other ever been involved in treatment, especially for the client? in reading over the description of the assessment tool, did it make sense to you about what was being asked? did you feel comfortable with it? maybe some of the questions didn't seem to make sense. if you are unsure about the questions, it may be helpful to refer to the instructions on the assessment tool with the client or family. next, let's consider other assessments that may be useful. the following sections describe some of the assessments that may be useful in your practice. as you read over the descriptions and think about how each of these might be applied to the client you are interviewing, think about the trade-offs between the ease of administration and the usefulness of the information obtained, some clients may be reluctant to cooperate and/or provide honest answers to questions. for these situations, you may want to consider whether you will assess your clients through a structured interview with a trained research assistant or through a less-structured assessment interview (i.e., interview without a trained research assistant present). remember, all of the following discussions are based on the clinical interview and may not apply in situations where less structured methods of measurement are used. 5ec8ef588b
