Accessories Unit Functions: The present invention relates to an airbag apparatus provided in a steering wheel of an automotive vehicle. In conventional airbag apparatuses, a reaction force against an occupant's chest receives not only a downward push force applied from an inflator to a steering wheel side, but also a push force of the occupant's chest which occurs due to a pushing of the occupant's chest against a steering wheel side wall. When the reaction force receives the push force, the occupant's chest is pushed together with the steering wheel side wall. Therefore, the occupant's chest is harder pressed by the steering wheel side wall than necessary, and the reaction force is not absorbed sufficiently. It is an object of the invention to provide an airbag apparatus which ensures a sufficient absorption of reaction force against an occupant's chest, and further prevents the occupant's chest from being pushed by a steering wheel side wall. To this end, there is provided according to the present invention an airbag apparatus, including an outer surface of which is attached to a front face of a steering wheel. The airbag apparatus is provided with an inflator, a flexible bag stored in the inflator, a support plate supported to be freely displaceable between an accommodation position of the bag and a release position of the bag, and a push-off plate supported to be freely displaceable between a contact position of the bag and a non-contact position spaced from the contact position of the bag. The push-off plate is urged toward the bag from the non-contact position to the contact position, and is in a position in which it presses a bag's outer surface toward the steering wheel's outer surface when the bag is compressed and released, the inflator, the push-off plate, and the support plate being so arranged that the support plate is located at the release position in a state in which the bag is inflated and then the bag is expanded by gas ejected from the inflator. Thus, since the support plate is located at the
